One of the toughest tasks faced by those that are studying for their CPA exam is setting up a study timetable. Taking the CPA exam is a big venture that will require a great deal more time than casual efforts to squeeze aside a few moments every now and then. With other commitments in life fighting for your attention, studying can easily drop to the bottom of your goal list. Without enough studying, you stand a great chance of failing one or more sections, thereby wasting both cash and time, as well as getting your hopes dashed. Nevertheless, if you'll set up a study schedule that works for you and be committed to it, there is a much better opportunity for you to nail it. Take a look at some tips that will help to make your study timetable for your CPA exam simpler:

-Shop around for a great CPA exam review course and grab it. A great course provides you with suggestions as to just how many hours you need to spend on studying, and exactly how much time for you to spend on each activity (watching video tutorials, doing multiple choice questions, performing simulations, etc.). Rogers CPA Review Course and Yaeger's Home Study Course are 2 of the top courses that have received excellent evaluation from quite a few of its supporters. You might wish to look at these.

-The AICPA advises that 2-3 hours of homework be done for every hour of lecture you view. Each CPA review course has videos which are of different lengths of course, so you'll have to calculate the total hours you'll be required to spend on doing homework depending on the length of the lecture video clip for the particular section you'll be taking. Upon examining how much time is needed for studying, you have to fully understand if it meets up with the months you have allotted for that particular section. Remember that whenever you are watching videos, you may have to watch it again in order to completely understand so make sure you include that time whenever putting together your schedule.

-You may want to commit one to three hours everyday for studying. There is no set amount of time which will work for everybody, as the time which you spend studying every day is determined by how difficult you find specific segments of the exam along with your general living timetable.

-Set realistic goals. It's alright to set a timetable that requires little time but actually do-able than setting up too much time where you find it impossible to accomplish.

-Study with other people that are also studying for their CPA exam. It will not be as dull as studying alone, and will additionally motivate you to stick to your objectives and study schedule. This is to also check if you have missed out on anything and will encourage you to follow your own schedule. In addition to that, being with someone which you can discuss the learning materials with can be quite beneficial to the learning process.

-Schedule your studying for whenever you have the most stamina. Make certain that you've got energy and proper state of mind before studying so stay away from being tired. This is due to the fact that your brain may be not able to successfully store information when you are fatigued. Not forgetting that you may find yourself unwilling to study because your body is also worn out.

-Have a break time for your timetable. If you push your mind to study for too much time without creating a break, this can easily cause information overload and may not be absorbed by your brain whatsoever. If you do so, you'll lose your concentration which virtually means wasting time instead of using that time for a more productive activity. Do not make yourself think which you have spent hours of studying when more often than not; your mind is roaming around. It is a great idea to get a little something to eat, stretch your legs and arms, have a shower, and do other brief activities in order to rest your mind. Try not to accomplish something too stimulating or addictive (for example playing video games) - or you may not feel like coming back for more studying whenever your break is over.
